“I first started going to this building (former Dunn Edwards Paint Store) way back when I was a runner at a construction company. I was 16 at the time. That building was a landmark and everyone bought their paint from Dunn Edwards. I always felt that the bones of that building were classic modern design. So when 25 years later, the opportunity to buy the property presented itself, I jumped on it. What was once an old paint store is now an iconic modern office building. I view this as adaptive reuse in the truest sense of the word. This was also the first project in which public art was a focal point. Notice the 18 foot tall metal sculpture “Jumper Man” prominently perched at the entrance of the building. He is the sentry!”
